Galloway Township, NJ- Environmental stewardship, preservation, alternative energy, and sustainability are all familiar phrases to students and faculty at The Richard Stockton College of New Jersey. Many of these environmental and political issues will be addressed in Stockton’s Sustainable Living-Learning Community’s upcoming guest speaker series. Leading advocates, opinion leaders, and policy-shapers from the area will engage and lead students, faculty, and community members in dialogues revolving around natural resource issues in the state. The dialogues will be held on Wednesday evenings throughout the spring semester at 6 p.m. inside the Lakeside Lodge on the College’s Galloway Township campus.

Professor of Political Science Patrick Hossay said, “We hope that the guest speaker series will catalyze a citizen dialogue that goes beyond right and left and invites varying perspectives on vital questions.”

All dialogue sessions are open to the public, and students, faculty, and community members are welcomed and encouraged to attend.

Stockton’s Sustainable Living-Learning Community is a unique program that allows students to integrate their campus living experience with their study or interest in environmental issues and green living. Students are given the opportunity to live in an environmentally-focused community that offers canoeing trips, wilderness backpacking trips, and a variety of other adventures and experiences. The Sustainable Living-Learning Community, part of New Jersey’s only curriculum focused on sustainability and environmental policy, is in its second year at the College.
