Scholarly Activity

SEPTEMBER 2009 THROUGH AUGUST 2010

STOCKTON COLLEGE
THE RICHARD STOCKTON COLLEGE OF NEW JERSEY
Foreword

A rich diversity of ideas and practices contributes to the legacy of what is so wonderful about Stockton. We are fundamentally a liberal arts college, rooted in interdisciplinary traditions and activities, focused on teaching as the primary work of faculty. This context provides a road map for our academic growth, both personally and as an institution. The effects of the liberal arts are reflected through our history and our values, shown through our nearly 40-year commitment to innovative education, and importantly in the many accomplishments outlined in this Report.

This publication provides significant evidence of the variety of ways faculty and staff contribute to scholarship: creative work and research, translating knowledge and skills to apply these to practices in our communities, contributing new ideas to pedagogy and course development, and in making fresh connections among disciplines and programs. Such scholarship is demonstrated through the breadth of presentations, publications, awards and consultancies that are included in this Report.

As a catalog, the Report belies the intellectual richness and time required to accomplish each entry here. We honor these achievements and are grateful for these contributions to the academic life at Stockton. I applaud your hard work.

Thank you on behalf of the entire College,

Acknowledgements

The coordination and care required to pull together the information included in this Report involved many days of time dedicated to producing a publication that showcases others. Those in the Grants Office, especially Heather Roeske, Jeanne DeMarsico and Ronnie Capella, deserve our heartfelt thanks for their work in making the Report worthy of those it celebrates. Our graphics production artists, especially Margo Alten, brought elegance to the Report. Of course, the Report would not exist without the scholarship of all who are named here. We are grateful for what you do. Thank you, all. –Beth Olsen
Arts and Humanities
School of Arts and Humanities

The wealth of scholarly and creative productivity undertaken by faculty in the Arts and Humanities needs to be considered from different vantage points, taking into account divisions between arts and humanities and those among the different disciplines.

Within the School there is the fundamental division between those faculty in the arts who engage in creating works of art of different kinds, and those in the humanities who engage, by and large, in more traditional scholarly work, producing articles and books for publication. There are also disciplinary differences within these two areas. In the humanities, faculty members follow different practices in accordance with the norms of their discipline. In Historical Studies, for example, faculty are expected to write a book-length monograph, while articles are very much of secondary importance; in Languages and Culture Studies, Literature, and Philosophy, articles are more frequently the norm. On the arts side, faculty in the Visual Arts most frequently develop work for exhibits, while publications are merely addenda to such work; in the Performing Arts, productivity is tied, for example, to the choreographed dance, the choral concert, or the directed or stage-managed play.

The faculty in the Arts and Humanities also endeavor to bridge these divisions, those between the arts and humanities and among the disciplines. Communication Studies, for example, includes in its ranks both those who study questions relating to the humanities and those who create works of art, usually documentaries and other video work. Likewise, Literature is made up of scholars studying literary work, and creative writers, who endeavor to fashion new contributions in fiction and poetry. Further, the interdisciplinary character and makeup of the faculty in the school, leads many artists to work with the humanists to produce plays based upon historical research, for example, and humanists who endeavor (sometimes inspired by the G courses they teach) to incorporate artistic themes and practices into their scholarship.

But, however one decides to look at the overall picture, it is clear that faculty within the School are very productive indeed, and that the volume and quality of their output, its breadth and its depth, compares favorably with any small liberal arts college in the United States. In this regard it is certainly an exciting time to be working within the School of Arts and Humanities.

The mission statement for the School of Business says about research that “The faculty actively pursues scholarly activities and professional development that contribute to classroom effectiveness” and that “The faculty produces scholarly works that advance the knowledge and practice of business, hospitality and tourism management, and computer science and information systems.” Congruent with our mission, this listing includes many works with a pedagogical focus, focusing on topics such as advising, assessment, service learning, e-portfolios, peer tutoring, use of new teaching media, civic engagement, and experiential projects. Scholarly discipline based research is represented by works on topics as diverse as (to name a few) liquidity premiums, new computer algorithms and heuristics, cyberbullying, and sustainable development. The applied focus that ties many in our school to our community are addressed in works addressing (again, to name only a few) social security planning, faculty unions, and same-sex marriage in NJ, as well as newspaper op-ed pieces on various state policies.

I am pleased to present a listing of the Business faculty’s scholarly accomplishments for the 2009-2010 academic year. This listing shows that we’re a group that is diverse along multiple dimensions, striving hard to make a positive impact in the lives of our students, our disciplines, and our communities.

Faculty in the School of Education produce some of the most thought-provoking practical research and scholarly work, for this reason I welcome the opportunity to introduce you to their accomplishments via this inaugural publication.

Central to preparing competent, caring, and qualified educators is their commitment to sharing research so all associated with learning and teaching might benefit. By simply browsing through the titles of research publications and presentations, readers can palpate both the caliber of our faculty and their unique scholarly approach to learning.

Topics ranging from “blended learning for students” to “origami-mathematics lessons” to “digital learners” to the “role of women in today’s labor market” to “assistive technologies” all suggest our faculty members are on the leading edge of transformative change in the educational arena. However, it is not just the research and professional presentations of our faculty that make them outstanding, it is “bringing their research to life in the classroom and community” that distinguish them among their colleagues.

Through application of their research, our faculty engages the surrounding educational community by working with current teachers seeking to hone their skills as well as with new students seeking to join the teaching profession. This nexus of faculty research, teaching, and community engagement makes Stockton’s School of Education vibrant and exciting!

The scholarly work from Education faculty exemplifies caring practitioners concerned with developing the best practices in diverse and technological rich learning environments. Our faculty rank among the best and we are proud of their contributions to our profession.

GENERAL STUDIES
The scholarly output of the school reflects not only the broad swath that the school inherently cuts across the cognitive domain but also, and appropriately, reflects the areas wherein the school puts its emphases. For example, in a school with primary responsibility for teaching freshmen and other students new to the College it is not surprising that faculty and staff publish and present on pedagogy: teaching, after all, is the first focus of College and school alike. Then there is more traditional scholarship - though, given our interdisciplinary focus, often in areas other than those easily recognizable in the confines of departmental specialties. The work we do in Holocaust and Genocide Studies, both in the curriculum and in our research, is a good example of that. Marrying scholarship and community service, we also are proud of the many Holocaust survivor memoirs that we continue to edit and prepare for publication. And, of course, those teaching in our writing program publish poetry, fiction, and non-fiction, and contribute to the scholarly discourse in literature, communication studies and cultural studies, even environmental studies.

A pundit once said that the relationship between research and teaching is similar to the one between sin and confession: if one does not commit the act, there is nothing to talk about. I, for one, am utterly convinced that the scholarly productivity of faculty and staff contributes not only our “knowledge habitat” but to the well deserved reputation of my school’s faculty (and staff who teach) for excellence in the classroom and beyond.

GRADUATE & CONTINUING STUDIES
School of Graduate and Continuing Studies

The scholarly output from the staff of the School of Graduate and Continuing Studies covers a broad spectrum of intellectual and applied work. Parallel to the scholarly activity of the staff (and far surpassing it in volume) is the scholarly output of our graduate students completing their thesis requirements and, of course, the graduate faculty who often invite students to co-author scholarly documents. The Graduate School is dedicated to advanced learning and advanced research. The School of Continuing Studies is also dedicated to advanced learning, especially targeted to specific professional areas (e.g., accounting, healthcare, project management, administration, management, social services and customer service) to advance knowledge, skills and positive outcomes for those they serve. Both schools are also dedicated to developing lifelong learning skills to meet the challenges of change and growth in the 21st century.

School of Health Sciences

Created from the Division of Professional Studies in 2008, SHS offers undergraduate programs in nursing, public health, and speech-language pathology. Three programs: occupational therapy (MSOT), post-baccalaureate nursing (MSN) and the doctor of physical therapy (DPT) comprise the graduate portfolio. Not surprisingly, we excel at and focus on applied or translational research – that branch of scientific inquiry that uses the results of clinical investigations for the populations under study. Appropriately, two faculty members were awarded a grant to evaluate how to create a culture of collaboration by vitalizing practice through research. Perhaps the most relevant and societal meaningful example of this approach is the research on using Body Mass Index (BMI) scores as an indicator of the need to increase physical activity and intensity – obesity as we all know is rapidly approaching epidemic proportions in our nation. The elderly anchor the opposite end of the age continuum and health sciences faculty also assess the unique requirements of those confined to long term care settings. Using yoga as a stress management tool for breast cancer patients addresses a pivotal and critically important but often overlooked aspect of illness. Acknowledging the complexity of the human condition through multidisciplinary research and the emerging practice of co-treatment therapy presages an emerging pattern in the delivery of health services. We continually seek to improve our instruction through the assessment of e-portfolio effectiveness and the use of technology, such as on-line collaborative social learning communities, to provide superior learning outcomes. These are just a few examples of the faculty’s rich and varied research agenda. Faculty in the School of Health Sciences will continue to pursue translational research because it provides the means to apply new knowledge and techniques to the populations we serve, and by inference, use the application of those techniques to generate continuing inquiry for improvement.

Einleitung

In dieser Arbeit wird die Rechnung der Matrizen vorgestellt. Matrizen sind quadratische Anordnungen von Zahlen, die in einerart Rechnung zu spielen haben. Die Matrizenrechnung ist eine wichtige Grundlage der linearen Algebra und findet in vielen Bereichen der Wissenschaften Anwendung.

Zur Darstellung werden die Grundbegriffe der Matrizenrechnung behandelt. Dazu gehören die Definition der Matrizen, ihre Addition und Multiplikation, die Determinanten und die inversen Matrizen. Zudem werden die Eigenwerte und Eigenvektoren von Matrizen erläutert.

Die Anwendung der Matrizenrechnung auf Lösungsprobleme wird ebenfalls besprochen. Hierzu gehören die linearen Gleichungssysteme und die Matrizenalgebra, die zur Lösung von Gleichungssystemen verwendet werden.

Schlussfolgerungen

Die Darstellung der Matrizenrechnung zeigt, dass diese ein wichtiges Werkzeug in der linearen Algebra ist. Die Behandlung der Grundbegriffe und ihre Anwendung auf Lösungsprobleme erweist sich als hilfreich für die praktische Anwendung in verschiedenen Bereichen der Wissenschaften.

The scholarly activities listed on the following pages represent the breadth of faculty work ranging from the theoretical, to the experimental, to the applied. It represents the breadth of NAMS' programs as well as both brand new faculty and those who go back to the Mayflower days. It should be pointed out that much of these scholarly accomplishments were done in conjunction with Stockton’s undergraduates; this faculty/research/mentor relationship is a hallmark of the NAMS educational experience. In addition, a perusal of the titles of these works reflects the interdisciplinary nature of the work as well as its global impacts.

I would be remiss if I did not mention the scholarly activities of Drs. Louise Sowers and March Richard which have resulted in their being named Oak Ridge Institute for Science and Education faculty researchers under the Transportation Security Laboratory of Homeland Security; the NSF grant awarded to Dr. Peter Straub, et al, which was leveraged with College funds to allow for the purchase of a sophisticated underwater Remotely Operated Vehicle (ROV); and the late Dr. Carol Slocum of the Marine Science Program. I salute the accomplishments of the NAMS' faculty listed in this report and look forward to that of the NAMS faculty over the coming academic year.

School of Social and Behavioral Sciences

The breadth of scholarship produced in the School of Social and Behavioral Sciences reflects important societal issues as well as the unique human attributes involved in their creation and resolution. Whether at the level of individual, family, community, or culture, the seeking of knowledge for human betterment is the hallmark of this faculty. While traditional areas of discipline are represented in the School – criminal justice, economics, political science, psychology, social work, and sociology/anthropology – the faculty’s research is truly interdisciplinary. Such topics as caregiving, crime, medical decision-making, depression, suicide, juror bias, and violence against women are addressed contextually and with respect to the myriad of variables that influence behavior.

The commitment to learning and community engagement is another distinctive element of the faculty’s work. Noteworthy is the acquisition of external funding to direct education toward particular groups such as older adults and future child welfare workers. In addition, the faculty continues to receive awards and recognition for prestigious achievements in both local and national arenas.
