Scholarly Activity

September 2010 through August 2011
Stockton College is proud to make available its annual Scholarly Activity Booklet to recognize and celebrate the exceptional faculty, staff, and students who have contributed their time and talent over the past year.

The individuals highlighted within these pages demonstrate the highest degree of commitment to Stockton’s core educational values: scholarly research, academic exploration, and creative expression. The work found within these pages is illustrative of the deep and meaningful connections that exist between those who teach and work on campus and the inquisitive minds who benefit from and contribute to the uniqueness of our school. In turn, these efforts directly support the College’s strategic themes of Learning, Engagement, Global Perspectives, and Sustainability.

The quality and reputation of Stockton as a distinguished institution of liberal arts, sciences, and professional studies are evident by the accomplishments found within these pages. Consequently, the rich variety of these scholarly efforts leads to a more vibrant campus, a more inspired faculty, and a more engaged and satisfied student body.

Stockton College congratulates all those who have played a role in this year’s scholarly efforts. We are both grateful and proud of the academic, artistic, and cultural contributions provided by the Stockton family.

Thank you on behalf of the entire College,

Harvey Kesselman
Provost and Executive Vice President
Once again, the faculty of the School of Arts and Humanities has been very productive both in scholarly and creative activities. ARHU scholars have published several books and a plethora of articles, while its artists have presented a great many, documentaries, exhibits, and performances. The School is very proud of this record, which complements and helps to bolster its strong reputation for teaching excellence.

Within the School there is the fundamental division between those faculty in the arts who engage in creating works of art of different kinds, and those in the humanities who engage, by and large, in more traditional scholarly work, producing articles and books for publication. There are also disciplinary differences within these two areas. In the humanities, faculty members follow different practices in accordance with the norms of their discipline. In Historical Studies, for example, faculty are expected to write a book-length monograph, while articles are very much of secondary importance; in Languages and Culture Studies, Literature, and Philosophy, articles are more frequently the norm. On the arts side, faculty in the Visual Arts most frequently develop work for exhibits, while publications are merely addenda to such work; in the Performing Arts, productivity is tied, for example, to the choreographed dance, the choral concert, or the directed or stage-managed play.

The faculty in the Arts and Humanities also endeavor to bridge these divisions, those between the arts and humanities and among the disciplines. Communication Studies, for example, includes in its ranks both those who study questions relating to the humanities and those who create works of art, usually documentaries and other video work. Likewise, Literature is made up of scholars studying literary work, and creative writers, who endeavor to fashion new contributions in fiction and poetry. Further, the interdisciplinary character and makeup of the faculty in the school, leads many artists to work with the humanists to produce plays based upon historical research, for example, and humanists who endeavor (sometimes inspired by the G courses they teach) to incorporate artistic themes and practices into their scholarship.

However one decides to look at the overall picture, it is clear that faculty within the School are very productive indeed, and that the volume and quality of their output, its breadth and its depth, compares favorably with any small liberal arts college in the United States. In this regard it is certainly an exciting time to be working within the School of Arts and Humanities.

School of Business

The mission statement for the School of Business says about research that “The faculty actively pursues scholarly activities and professional development that contribute to classroom effectiveness” and that “The faculty produces scholarly works that advance the knowledge and practice of business, hospitality and tourism management, and computer science and information systems.” Congruent with our mission, the School of Business faculty had a productive year of scholarly activity, with a broad cross section of the faculty having activities within AY10-11.

The work described below covers a broad range of important and timely topics, new ways of learning including service, experiential, and IT mediated learning, cyberbullying, sustainable development, multicultural issues within the hospitality industry, the legal implications of plagiarism, and business issues ranging in scope from New Jersey focused to international. We also note with pride the first patent obtained by a School of Business faculty member. This listing of scholarly works again highlights the business faculty is a group that is diverse along multiple dimensions, striving hard to make a positive impact in the lives of our students, our disciplines, and our communities.

We in the School of Education are proud to salute our faculty and share some of their thought-provoking practical research and scholarly work during the past year. This is the second year that our faculty members have been highlighted for their contributions to the profession and to the future of our students.

A review of this information suggests School of Education faculty are committed to preparing competent, caring, and qualified educators by sharing their research so all associated with learning and teaching might benefit. The range of research is remarkable, covering such diverse topics as creating a learning environment for all students to advising non-native English speaking students to using interactive multi-media in teacher education to living standards and social well-being to concepts, rigor and relevance in the 21st Century. It is clear that our faculty members are on the leading edge of transformative change in their respective disciplines. However, it is not just the research and professional presentations of our faculty that make them outstanding, it is bringing their research to life in the classroom and community that distinguish them among their colleagues.

The extent to which our faculty members collaborate with their peers and with colleagues from other educational institutions - both nationally and internationally - distinguishes our School of Education as being vibrant and exciting!

Simply put, our faculty members are caring practitioners concerned with developing the best practices in diverse and technological rich learning environments. Our faculty rank among the best and we are proud of their contributions to our profession.

General Studies
The School of General Studies has a deserved and well documented reputation for excellence in teaching. That excellence is based on twin pillars:

- Faculty members are in constant and deep conversation with their fields through their scholarship. That scholarship, for example, probes the interdisciplinary complexities of the scourge of genocide, an educational priority of the College and an area wherein the College has earned international recognition.

- Faculty members are also deeply involved with the craft of teaching and this year’s report again shows the significant efforts of faculty to assess classroom performance and to improve learning among students through research on innovative pedagogies.

Thus, these twin pillars build a bridge between teaching and research and in doing so underpin the notion that any dichotomy between teaching and research is false: one cannot have excellence in one area without excellence in the other.

I am proud of the General Studies faculty, of their high productivity and their unyielding commitment to meaningful liberal arts education. Their energetic industry dovetails with the College ambition to provide the best possible public higher education. This year’s report is proof of a job well done.

Graduate & Continuing Studies
The School of Graduate and Continuing Studies staff primarily engage in applied scholarly activities involving the enhancement of professional competencies and the development of lifelong learning skills. The Graduate School staff seek to develop enhanced skill sets in marketing, recruiting and orienting incoming graduate students as well as skill sets that lead to positive retention and completion outcomes. The Continuing Studies staff target an external audience consisting of professionals who require skill development, continuing education units or who have decided to enhance their understanding of a particular subject matter. Designing and delivering these learning outcomes requires continuous research into the newest information and knowledge of best practices. The interaction with a wide variety of external clients allows the Continuing Studies staff to make valuable connections for the college that frequently results in future partnering.

Health Sciences
The School of Health Sciences offers undergraduate programs in nursing, public health, and speech-language pathology. Three programs: occupational therapy (MSOT), advanced practice nursing (MSN) and the doctor of physical therapy (DPT) comprise the graduate portfolio with a fourth, the Master of Science in Communication Disorders (MSCD) scheduled to begin in the Fall of 2011. Not surprisingly, we excel at and focus on applied or translational research (qualitative and quantitative) – that branch of scientific inquiry that uses the results of clinical investigations for the populations under study. Perhaps the most relevant and societal meaningful example of this approach is the research on using Body Mass Index (BMI) scores as an indicator of the need to increase physical activity and intensity – obesity as we all know is rapidly approaching epidemic proportions in our nation. Our youngest citizens are now diagnosed with diseases of the heart normally reserved for their parents or grandparents. Currently the SHS is home to a subcontract for three research projects focusing on reducing childhood obesity. The elderly anchor the opposite end of the age continuum and health sciences faculty also assess the unique requirements of those confined to long term care settings or requiring treatment because of other diseases associated with the aging process. Using yoga as a stress management tool for breast cancer patients addresses a pivotal and critically important but often overlooked aspect of physical illness. Developing effective strategies to address mental health concerns is an essential focus of the occupational therapy faculty as they work with college students in the Bridge Program. Acknowledging the complexity of the human condition through multidisciplinary research and the practice of co-treatment therapy presages an emerging pattern in the delivery of health services. Population health challenges such as asthma and disaster preparedness are topics our public health and nursing faculty focus on – an essential approach under the current reform structure. We continually seek to improve our instruction through the assessment of e-portfolio effectiveness and the use of technology, such as on-line collaborative social learning communities, to provide superior learning outcomes. These are just a few examples of the faculty’s rich and varied research agenda. Faculty in the School of Health Sciences will continue to pursue translational research because it provides the means to apply new knowledge and techniques to the populations we serve, and by inference, use the application of those techniques to generate continuing inquiry for improvement.

Natural Sciences & Mathematics
Faculty and staff of the School of Natural Sciences and Mathematics are involved in cutting-edge scholarship within their disciplines as well as research of an interdisciplinary nature. This work has been recognized nationally and internationally. In addition, it is important to note that many of these scholarly endeavors involved Stockton undergraduate and graduate students assisting the faculty in the laboratory, the field, or at the computer on many projects or partnering as co-authors and/or presenters at local, regional, or national venues. A long time hallmark of the School of Natural Sciences and Mathematics programs has been the enrichment students receive through this unique collaborative experience.

In particular it is important to note that the Coastal Research Center has continued to increase its contracts and grants with local municipalities, the State of New Jersey, and the federal government. Individual NAMS faculty or teams of collaborators have been funded by the National Science Foundation, Sea Grant (NOAA), the Department of Homeland Security, the Army Corps of Engineers, and the Department of Environmental Protection and Transportation of the State of New Jersey. I would be remiss if I did not thank the College on behalf of NAMS’ faculty for the array of grant programs supporting their research and that of their students. These programs, in many instances, have served as the starting point for many of the external grants awarded to the faculty.

I'm proud to introduce the recent faculty activities in The School of Social and Behavioral Sciences. Their efforts in scholarship and engagement demonstrate a commitment to both individual development and social-cultural enhancement. They seek to understand the impact of physical and mental health, as well as the intricacies of cultural norms and societal interdependencies. Whether it be a focus on psychological well being, healthy communities, civil rights, legislative reform, or political stability, the faculty not only contribute to the scholarly knowledge base, but are also willing to share their expertise with students and community alike.

Please join me in congratulating the Social and Behavioral Sciences faculty for their accomplishments and contributions.
